Moreover, the interface is radically different from previous versions. It's modeled after Google's Material Design. How well it works is entirely dependant on how familiar you are with the new interface. It's intuitive, to a point - the most common actions are where you would least expect them. There are also two actions that utilize the Adobe Sensei AI. These actions will recommend possible action steps depending on the scene you are working on; for instance, you can ask for the best approach for removing a person from a photograph. This is one of the most important aspects of the upgrade, and there are surely people out there who do every action they come across. However, for users without a lot of time, they may find it a little too challenging. When you shoot JPEG, the camera LUT is applied to the RAW file you shoot. Should you later edit the JPEG, you'll be in trouble. Some convert RAW to JPEG, as Andrey Pinchuk does, so as to be able to apply whatever LUT they wish. However, there are many who say they use a LUT just to allow them to use the RAW photo in future editing software. In Lightroom, you can't do that: It shot the RAW file without applying a LUT. What's more, the LUT is completely different from camera to camera. Moreover, it does not stay static. If you shoot 3D for instance, the color of 3D-developed photos is totally different from the regular development present in JPEG photographs. There will be no way to predict, or emulate, the color as it will stay with you forever.

We now witness an enormous and continuous growth in digital creativity, and the requirement to access digital technology in all areas of study. This new learning environment is based on an image-centered approach, encouraging students to use images as a source of knowledge.
