Environmentally relevant concentrations of Trichodesmium erythraeum promote the survival of squid larvae. The cyanobacteria Trichodesmium erythraeum colonises shallow waters across the globe and forms blooms that are able to persist for months, even in oligotrophic regions. Worldwide, these blooms cause considerable, sometimes adverse environmental and economic problems. In addition to the well-known negative effects on animals and humans, there is growing evidence that blooms can also have a negative impact on marine life and their survival. However, the majority of investigations that have explored whether negative effects occur on larvae of different species have focused on populations of molluscs and crustaceans. In the current study, juvenile species of the pelagic cephalopod Sepiella inermis were exposed to Trichodesmium erythraeum at an unprecedented concentration (16 mg C l⁻¹), represented here as 10⁹ Trichodesmium cells l⁻¹) and with only a short exposure period (48 h). After this exposure, the growth and development of the larvae was still impaired, but not to the same degree as in previous experiments. Hence, larvae were more resilient against a Trichodesmium concentration that was 10 times lower than concentrations that adversely affected growth and survival in previous studies. However, the costs that were imposed by the adverse effects of Trichodesmium erythraeum may be considerable, even at an environmentally relevant concentration.

Is there such a thing as a personality disorder without sadness? Do things have to be sad for a person with a depressive personality disorder? The answer is no. All of the symptoms of a personality disorder can include sadness. A healthy sense of worth and worthlessness is a facet of every personality type, and having a healthy sense of worth can cause a person to feel happy. High self-esteem and low self-esteem can both cause sadness. If you have a
