This invention relates to a fluid storage and delivery system and more particularly to an improved system suitable for storing and delivering liquid fluids such as water, or the like, which requires added refrigeration or heating for storage or delivery of the liquid fluid. A wide variety of domestic and industrial water heating and delivery systems are in use. In order to maintain an adequate supply of liquid water, most of these systems require significant amounts of energy, especially electrical energy, to operate the components for storage and delivery of the liquid water. Heating water to supply a hot water or hot water heating system has traditionally been accomplished by heating the water in a boiler with an open flame. However, this is a wasteful way of providing energy to the water system, and with the current rising price of energy, these systems have become very expensive to operate. In recent years, electric water heating systems have been developed. These systems generally utilize a storage tank which is maintained at a near constant temperature by an electric thermostatically controlled water heater. The tanks utilize either the thermal expansion or thermo expansion of the water to raise the water to an appropriate temperature for delivery. Typically, these systems utilize a compressor or blower to circulate the water through the storage tank in an attempt to raise the water to the desired temperature in a near constant time. A number of important drawbacks are associated with these systems. For example, many of these systems are large and expensive. Further
