The performance problems release explains, among other things, that there's a bug that causes heavy photo editing to hundreds of images open at once slow the PC to a standstill. If you're porting a number of images in bulk from an old version to this one, your camera company's support department (if you happen to be using one, that is) should have instructions on how to transfer your photos to the new address system. Most likely, you'll also have to log into your Lightroom account and switch the photolibrary to use the new address system. The application has also changed from the 4.2.1 standard to the 4.2.2 standard. This is a bit confusing for people who haven't been working with Lightroom for some time, and there aren't any amended GUIs to help with that. Beginning with Lightroom 5.0, Adobe has been dropping support for users in Argentina, Brazil, China, France, Germany, Japan, Mexico, Russia, Singapore, and Spain, among other countries. (At least, that's what the notes under the "About" tab at the bottom of the "File" menu mention.) Likewise, there have been changes to licensing that are of interest to US users. The "Free to Use" notice has been dropped, because Adobe now considers that it's free to those who are covered by another license. So, basically, those who run into problems with licensing in other countries may want to check with their own country's distributor about how to get the necessary licenses. In some countries, the distribution is limited to one type of license, instead of offering multiple options.
