See id. at 1007. Whether the evidence supports the amount of damages as reflected in the plaintiff's damages model is a jury question. See id. at 1011. Because the lower court's factual findings in this case are unsupported by the record, the issue of damages must be remanded to the trial court for further evidentiary proceedings. Accordingly, we vacate the trial court's order and remand for a new trial on damages. We vacate the remainder of the judgment and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion. The entry is: Judgment vacated. Remanded to the Superior Court for further proceedings. GODFREY, J., did not sit. Amplifier and buffers are important components in many different electronic systems. The most common types of amplifiers include, for example, basic class AB amplifiers, class B amplifiers, class C amplifiers, class E amplifiers, class F amplifiers, class G amplifiers and a variety of single ended and differential amplifiers. Buffers are typically provided to protect sensitive inputs and outputs of the electronic system from changes in load impedance. In various types of electronic systems such as computers, memory devices, and other types of processing systems, it is desirable to utilize transistors having low output resistance, large drive capability, and high bandwidth. For example, in a memory device, a data bit may be read from or written to a memory cell based upon a voltage on a bus that is coupled to the
